HUNTINGTON NATIONAL BANK,)
)	MEMORANDUM OPINION Defendant.)

This is a diversity action in which plaintiffs seek to hold the defendant bank responsible for aiding and abetting a massive fraud perpetrated by Cyberco Holdings, Inc., a former customer of the bank. Discovery in this matter is closed, summary judgment motions are pending, and the matter is set for trial in the month of July 2009. Presently pending before the court is plaintiffs' motion for leave to take the de bene esse deposition of James Michael Horton, a former executive officer of Cyberco. Leave of court is necessary because Mr. Horton is serving a prison sentence of over seven years, imposed by Judge Robert Holmes Bell on December 12, 2006, for Mr. Horton's complicity in the mail fraud, bank fraud, and money-laundering activities of Cyberco. (United States v. Horton, No. 1:06-cr-87).

Plaintiffs move pursuant to Rule 30(a)(2)(B), which requires leave of court to conduct a deposition of a deponent confined in prison. Generally, this court grants leave for such depositions freely, as long as the deposition can be conducted without undue imposition on prison authorities.

In the present case, defendant objects to the deposition on two essential grounds.¹ First, defendant asserts that Horton's name is not contained on plaintiffs' Rule 26(a)(1) initial disclosure and that, by virtue of Rule 37(c)(1), exclusion of the witness's testimony is mandatory. Second, defendant argues that discovery is closed, and that plaintiffs have not shown good cause to amend the case management order to allow further discovery as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 16(b). District Judge Janet T. Neff has referred this matter to me for decision pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(A).

Upon review, I find that neither of the defendant's arguments are persuasive. Plaintiffs will be granted leave to take this deposition and preserve the testimony of James Horton for trial by means of an oral deposition.

Rule 26(a)(1) requires that parties make initial disclosures, unless otherwise ordered by the court, providing specified information, including the name of each individual likely to have discoverable information that the disclosing party may use to support its claims or defenses. FED. R. CIV. P. 26(a)(1)(A)(i). Rule 37(c) provides sanctions for failure to make a proper Rule 26(a) disclosure. Rule 37(c)(1) provides in its entirety as follows:

(c) Failure to Disclose, to Supplement an Earlier Response, or to Admit.

- (1) Failure to Disclose or Supplement. If a party fails to provide information or identify a witness as required by Rule 26(a) or (e), the party is not allowed to use that information or witness to supply evidence on a motion, at a hearing, or at a trial, unless the failure was substantially justified or is harmless. In addition to or instead of this sanction, the court, on motion and after giving an opportunity to be heard:

- (A) may order payment of the reasonable expenses, including attorney's fees, caused by the failure;
- (B) may inform the jury of the party's failure; and
- (C) may impose other appropriate sanctions, including any of the orders listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(vi).

FED. R. CIV. P. 37(c)(1). In the present case, it is undisputed that the name of James Michael Horton does not appear in plaintiffs' Rule 26(a)(1) disclosure, but it does appear in the disclosure submitted by defendant. Defendant argues that plaintiffs' failure to include Horton's name in its Rule 26(a)(1) disclosure requires preclusion of his testimony at trial.

Rule 37(c)(1), which has been part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure for over fifteen years, squints Janus-like in two opposite directions. The rule appears to establish a mandatory and automatic preclusion of a party's use of information or witnesses that the party did not disclose as required by Rule 26(a). This has led courts, including the Sixth Circuit, to observe that preclusion is automatic under Rule 37. See, e.g., Caudell v. City of Loveland, 226 F. App'x 479, 481 n.1 (6th Cir. 2007). The mandatory language of Rule 37(c)(1), however, is followed by a very important subordinate clause that is introduced with the conjunction "unless." Under the rule, exclusion is mandatory "unless" the court finds that the failure was substantially justified or is harmless. Furthermore, the rule provides for additional or alternative sanctions, including the payment of expenses or any of the sanctions listed in Rule 37(b)(2)(A)(i)-(vi). Consequently, what begins as a mandatory sanctions ends as a sanction that must be imposed unless the court finds that the failure was substantially justified or was harmless or unless the court chooses to impose an alternative sanction. In short, Rule 37(c)(1) bears all the hallmarks of a committee-made project, with something for everyone.

Courts attempting to apply these seemingly inconsistent provisions have determined that the sanctions of exclusion is “automatic and mandatory” unless the offending party can show that its violation was either justified or harmless. See, e.g., David v. Caterpillar, Inc., 324 F.3d 851, 857 (7th Cir. 2003). This places the burden of avoiding automatic sanctions squarely on the party who failed to make a proper disclosure. See Roberts ex rel. Johnson v. Galen of Virginia, Inc., 325 F.3d 776, 782 (6th Cir. 2003). Moreover, despite the mandatory language of the rule, the appellate courts continue to insist that the matter falls within the sound discretion of the trial court. Id.; accord Design Strategy, Inc. v. Davis, 469 F.3d 284, 297 (2d Cir. 2006) (preclusion remains discretionary, even where nondisclosing party has not met its burden to show that violation was justified or harmless).

On the present record, I conclude that plaintiffs have met their burden of showing that their failure to include Horton’s name in their Rule 26(a)(1) disclosure is harmless. In determining whether a nondisclosure is harmless, courts look at a number of factors, but the principal factor is whether the opponent will be prejudiced or surprised. See, e.g., David v. Caterpillar, Inc., 324 F.3d at 857. In light of the central role of the discovery rules in eliminating surprise in civil matters, the extreme sanction of preclusion is simply not warranted when the importance of the additional witness was already known to the opponent. See, e.g., Gutierrez v. AT&T Broadband, LLC, 382 F.3d 725, 732-33 (7th Cir. 2004); Newman v. GHS Osteopathic, Inc., 60 F.3d 153, 156 (3d Cir. 1995). The seeds of this attitude are found in the commentary to Rule 37(c) itself. The Advisory Committee’s comments identify, among other circumstances indicating that a failure would be harmless, the situation in which a party omits disclosure of a name “of a potential witness known to all parties,” or omits “to list as a trial witness a person so listed by another party.” FED. R. CIV. P. 37(c), advisory committee notes, 1993 amends. Along the same lines, the supplementation provisions of Rule 26, which require updating of a Rule 26(a)(1) disclosure throughout the life of a case, contain an exemption for information that has otherwise been made known to the opposing party during the discovery process. FED. R. CIV. P. 26(e)(1)(A). These provisions make it clear that a party will not be allowed to insist on exclusion of a witness whose relevance the party was already aware of, especially when that party has itself recognized the witness’s importance by including him in the party’s own Rule 26(a) disclosure.

Defendant argues that a finding of harmlessness arising from the opponent’s previous awareness of a witness was justifiable under the 1993 version of the rule, but is no longer valid after the amendments in 2000. The 1993 version of the rule required disclosure of all individuals “likely to have discoverable information,” whether or not that information helped or hurt the disclosing party. After seven years of experimentation and experience under the 1993 rule, the Supreme Court narrowed its scope in the year 2000. By reason of the 2000 amendment, a party is obliged to disclose individuals “likely to have discoverable information” but only if the disclosing party may use that individual “to support its claims or defenses.” Defendant argues, with support from some unpublished decisions from several district courts, that the effect of this change is to force a party to commit in its Rule 26(a)(1) disclosures to the possible use of the person at trial. Therefore, the argument goes, the dual function of Rule 26(a)(1) disclosures after 2000 is to inform the opponent not only of the witness’s existence but also of the party’s intent to call the person as a witness. See, e.g., Coles v. Perry, No. 01-732, 2002 WL 1263979, at * 1 (D.D.C. June 7, 2002) (“The significant difference is that now the party is obligated to make the explicit representation that it is likely that she may rely on the potential testimony of the individual named.”). Consequently, defendant asserts that the suggestion in the 1993 Advisory Committee Note that a failure to disclose is harmless if the identity of the witness was already known to the opponent, while cogent in 1993, is no longer valid. According to defendant and these courts, the opponent’s knowledge of the existence of the witness cannot excuse a failure to disclose. Rather, exclusion is required unless the party has actually informed the opponent “that it might call the witness in support of its claims or defenses.” Pal v. New York Univ., No. 06Civ5892, 2008 WL 2627614, at * 4 (S.D.N.Y. July 10, 2008).

This rigid view of the effect of the 2000 amendments is not persuasive, as it reads the rule in a vacuum. First, the disclosures required by Rule 26(a)(1) are expressly “initial” disclosures, not witness lists for trial. For that reason, this court routinely requires initial disclosures very early in the case, often within thirty days of the Rule 16 conference. It is unreasonable to read Rule 26(a)(1) as requiring some sort of commitment that the party will, or even might, call the person at trial; that is the function of the “Pretrial Disclosure” of witnesses required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 26(a)(3). The distinct purpose of the initial disclosure is to alert the opponent to the existence of a witness whose testimony may be helpful to the disclosing party. Far from seeking to impose a more rigorous disclosure burden on parties, the 2000 amendments were designed to “narrow” the scope of the disclosure obligation. FED. R. CIV. P. 26, advisory committee’s notes, 2000 amends. Under the 1993 version of the rule, a party was obliged to disclose all individuals likely to have discoverable knowledge. In 2000, that obligation was narrowed to include only witnesses that the disclosing party deemed useful to its case, and relieve the party of disclosing harmful witnesses or information. See 8 CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ARTHUR R. MILLER, RICHARD L. MARCUS, FEDERAL PRACTICE & PROCEDURE § 2053 (Supp. 2009). Even after the 2000 amendments, courts continue to observe that the purpose of Rule 26(a)(1) initial disclosures “is to give the opposing party information as to the identification and location of persons with knowledge, so that they can be contacted in connection with the litigation. . . .” Biltrite Corp. v. World Road Markings, Inc., 202 F.R.D. 359, 362 (D. Mass. 2001). This, and not identification of testifying witnesses at trial, continues to be the function of initial disclosures. Defendant, and some of the cases it relies on, confuse these distinct functions.

Defendant’s reading of Rule 26(a)(1) also tends to repeal the exception for harmless failure to disclose contained in Rule 37(c)(1). According to defendant, the ironclad obligation created by the rule is that a party unambiguously commit to possible use of a witness in support of its case, no matter how obvious the witness’s importance might otherwise be. Even in situations such as the present one, in which the objecting party has itself disclosed the witness, that party can exclude the same witness’s testimony at trial, not on the ground that the witness’s testimony is a surprise, but on the ground that the opponent’s intention to use the same witness is a surprise. This appears to foster the very gamesmanship that the rules were designed to avoid. Under defendant’s reading of the rule, the only way to prevent preclusion is to comply with the disclosure requirement, without exception. Significantly, the commentary to the 2000 amendments to Rule 37 does not state or imply that the harmlessness analysis set forth in the 1993 commentary, specifically referring to witnesses disclosed by the other party, was no longer valid in light of the 2000 amendments.

The weight of authority does not support this inflexible approach. Many of the cases cited by defendant itself recognize that prejudice to the objecting party remains the hallmark of the harmlessness analysis. For example, in Troykna v. Cleveland Chiropractic Clinic, 280 F.3d 1200

(8th Cir. 2002), the court affirmed exclusion of undisclosed witnesses whose names had “been identified or referenced somewhere in the course of discovery.” 280 F.3d at 1205. The court agreed that use of the witnesses would have been prejudicial on the ground of “unfair surprise” to the plaintiff. Id. Significantly, these witnesses did not appear on the plaintiff’s own witness list, and it is doubtful that the court could or would have found unfair surprise if they had. Likewise, in Lyman v. St. Jude Med. S.C., Inc., 580 F. Supp. 2d 719 (E.D. Wis. 2008) (also cited by defendant), the court excluded undisclosed witnesses even though their names “surfaced” during the course of discovery. 580 F. Supp. 2d at 729. There is a vast difference between witnesses whose names were “referenced” or “surfaced” during discovery and those whose importance is so apparent that the objecting party itself discloses them.

The crucial inquiry, therefore, is whether the nondisclosure is harmless on the one hand or prejudicial on the other. This is a factual inquiry, to be made on the basis of the circumstances of the case, not bright-line rules of exclusion. In arguing strenuously against Horton’s deposition, defendant emphasizes that Horton’s centrality to the facts of the case was patently obvious to plaintiffs. “Horton has been known to plaintiffs for years. He dealt with plaintiffs from the moment they negotiated and executed their lease transactions with Cyberco, and even signed the contract documents plaintiffs attached to their complaint. Plaintiffs further specifically referenced his conviction for crimes of dishonesty in their complaint.” (Def. Brief, docket # 503, at 5-6) (citations to record omitted). In so arguing, defendant makes it just as plain that Horton’s connection to the case was patently obvious to defendant as well. Defendant’s own listing of Horton reinforces this conclusion. Furthermore, defendant cannot be surprised by the substance of Horton’s testimony, because defendant has had the benefit of two Bankruptcy Rule 2004 examinations of Horton under oath in the Cyberco bankruptcy proceedings.

In the circumstances of this case, where Horton's role in the case as a person with discoverable information was obvious to defendant at the outset and where defendant itself listed Horton in its Rule 26(a)(1) disclosure, the court can confidently conclude that plaintiffs' nondisclosure of Horton was harmless. The mandatory preclusion of Rule 37(c)(1) is therefore not applicable.

Defendant further argues that the deposition of Horton should not be allowed because discovery has closed, plaintiffs have taken their maximum allotted number of depositions, and plaintiffs have not shown good cause for modifying the case management order as required by Rule 16(b). If plaintiffs were seeking a discovery deposition of Mr. Horton, this argument would be well taken. Plaintiffs, however, seek to preserve Horton's testimony for trial. Defendant correctly points out that the Rules of Civil Procedure do not specifically differentiate between discovery depositions and evidence depositions. The universal and longstanding practice in this court (and most other trial courts), however, has recognized this common-sense distinction. See Burket v. Hyman-Lippitt, P.C., Nos. 05-72110, 05-72171, 05-72221, 2008 WL 1741875, at * 3 (E.D. Mich. Apr. 11, 2008) (close of discovery did not preclude taking of de bene esse depositions). The simple fact, known to all trial practitioners, is that witnesses often become unavailable for trial, whether because of distance or conflicting schedules (as with testifying physicians). In such circumstances, de bene esse depositions taken shortly before trial are commonplace and are properly understood as part of the trial proceedings, not discovery.

It is not surprising that defendant has found some courts espousing a different view. Apparently, in the Southern District of New York, de bene esse depositions must be taken by the close of discovery. See George v. Ford Motor Co., No. 03Civ7643, 2007 WL 2398806, at * 12 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 17, 2007). Whatever the practice may be in Manhattan, the longstanding approach in Western Michigan is to allow de bene esse depositions shortly before trial if there is a good reason preventing live appearance of a witness at trial. The court always has the authority to prevent abuse of the de bene esse procedure by a litigant, but no such abuse appears here.

In the present case, if the court acceded to defendant's argument, plaintiffs would still have the opportunity to present Horton's testimony at trial, through the expensive and cumbersome process of seeking a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum. This would require transportation of Horton in custody from his place of incarceration in Wisconsin to this court, with all of the attendant costs and security concerns that such a process entails. A de bene esse deposition, taken at the place of incarceration, is safer and much less expensive to the parties and is a superior alternative in every way. To prevent any possible abuse of the de bene esse deposition process, the order allowing the deposition will provide that it can only be used for purposes of trial and not in connection with any pretrial motion, including motions for summary judgment.

Conclusion

For the foregoing reasons, plaintiffs will be granted leave to depose James Michael Horton pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 30(a)(2)(B).
